Take a look at the top of your browser. What do you see? If you see maybe one or two or even just a handful of essential tabs open: Congratulations! You've clearly achieved some sort of Marie Kondo-like serenity. We're very proud and very jealous of you. But if you're like the other 99 percent of us, you probably have somewhere around 50 plus tabs of random webpages open. Sure, you've got the essentials: your email, your Google Drive, your social media. But you also have dozens of websites you've visited once or twice and decided to save "just in case." That random article on getting your finances in order. That news report you meant to read yesterday. That internet list about cute puppies. A shopping site for a pair of shoes you've been waiting to go on sale. A random Keto recipe you've totally been meaning to try. And everything in between. We just can't seem to click that little "X" and be rid of these tabs once and for all (or, internet forbid, organize them in a Bookmarks folder). So, why do we have so many tabs open at all times? According to Ellen Scott of Metro, it's a sort of multi-tasking called "task switching." When we task switch, it's like "protection against boredom," says Metro. We use multiple tabs to satiate all our different needs and whims, from everything like our more productive, work life to our need for fun. So, this is why you probably have internet quizzes up in a tab next to your work email. However, there's a big drawback of task switching. "People tend to believe they're good at multi-tasking, that they really can pay attention to multiple things at once and get a load of work done. But that isn't the case," Scott says. Instead of multi-tasking, we should instead be focusing on one thing in order to get better results. "Having lots of tabs open can potentially result in information overload...and rather than creating efficiency, switching frequently between tasks may lead to short attention spans and a lack of depth in the ongoing tasks," Dr Daria Kuss, the course leader of Cyberpsychology at Nottingham Trent University, told Metro. Think about it: You're sitting at work, writing an email to your boss. Then, a notification pops up. You check it. Then a different one pops up. Then another. Then another. Suddenly, you realize it's taken you over half an hour or more to write a simple work email when it should've taken you five. This is the danger of the tabs. "People are scared of missing out on any information so keep tabs open. It is a case of 'I might miss something' if I close a tab," said Professor Mike Berry, a psychologist at Birmingham City University, to Metro. But how do we combat this internet FOMO and conquer the tabs? Well, the first thing is to accept that our computers, much like our own brains, have limitations. "We treat our computers as if they have an unlimited capacity, just like we treat our brain. But when we overload our brain, we become tired, forgetful, irritable. When we overload tabs, the page slows down, and the computer/phone may be less efficient," Marc Hekster, Consultant Clinical Psychologist at The Summit Clinic, told Metro. Of course, says Scott, you don't need to get rid of all your tabs in order to break this habit. Many people keep a few tabs open in order to quick reference the few things they need to stay productive during the day. After all, who wants to close and open a new window every time they need to fact check something or respond to an email? The only thing to be wary about is whether you're keeping tabs open to be efficient or keeping them open as a distraction. No one can focus on or remember 1000 things at once, so why should your computer browser? Go ahead, take a breath, and click that "X." Thanks for your feedback! Samsung's first tablet running Android 4.0 Ice Cream Sandwich, the Galaxy Tab 2 announced today, succeeds the original 7-inch Galaxy Tab with little change besides the latest software. Don't expect anything groundbreaking in the specs department: the Galaxy Tab 2 runs on a 1GHz dual-core processor, with 1GB of RAM and a 7-inch display with a 1024 by 600 pixels resolution. It has a 3-megapixel camera at the back and a front-facing VGA camera on the front for video calls. The Tab 2 is 0.41 inches (10.5 mm) thick and weighs 0.75 pounds (344 grams), compared to the iPad 2's 0.34 inches (8.8 mm) thickness and 1.32 pounds (601 grams) weight. Samsung said the Galaxy Tab 2 will come in 8, 16, and 32GB models (a microSD card slot allows for extra storage of up to 32GB), as well as Wi-Fi only and 3G varieties. The company didn't give out pricing and availability for the U.S., but confirms the tablet will first release in the UK and Scandinavian countries in March, priced at around $450 for the Wi-Fi-only model, and around $550 for the Wi-Fi + 3G model — hovering near the iPad. On top of Android 4.0, Samsung is adding its Hub line of services, including music, bookstore and newsstand, games and movies for purchase or rent. As usual, Samsung tinkered with the original Android 4.0 interface and added the Touchwiz skin, which includes S Suggest, an app recommendation service, and AllShare Play, which can live stream content from a PC to the tablet. Since Samsung did not confirm the U.S. pricing for the Galaxy Tab 2, it's unclear whether the company is targeting the best-selling Android tablet, the Kindle Fire; or the tablet market leader, the iPad. If international pricing is any indication, the Tab 2 has a price tag equivalent to iPad 2, although it offers a smaller screen for the same money. Compared to the Kindle Fire, the Tab is almost twice as expensive and very close in specs, aside from the cameras. Follow Daniel Ionescu and Today @ PCWorld on Twitter Lum3n.com/Pexels Having a ton of tabs open while browsing the internet may soon be a thing of the past. At least for users of Chrome for Android. According to Android Police, a new "Sneak peek" feature may allow users to view another webpage as an overlay within the tab they're currently viewing. When users are viewing a page and notice another link they might be interested in viewing, the "Sneak peek" feature would let them click and hold the link to select an overlay that shows them the link's content. With the use of the Sneak peek option, opening separate tabs could be best reserved for webpages users are certain they want to come back to. Getting to peek at another page can help users decide if certain content is worth opening a new tab. Sneak peek is not currently available for the stable version of Chrome for Android, but interested users can still check it out if they have either Chrome Canary or Chrome Dev downloaded on their mobile devices. To test the new feature, launch either Chrome Canary or Dev and enter the following into the search bar: chrome://flags/#enable-ephemeral-tab. Once the corresponding flag page loads, the feature will be listed as An Ephemeral Tab in an Overlay Panel. There is a drop-down menu beneath its name, just tap it and select Enabled. Once enabled, the app must be relaunched before the Sneak peek feature will appear. The feature can be tested by opening a webpage, selecting a link on it, and holding it until a menu appears. The Sneak peek option should appear within the menu as New sneak peek. Once the option is selected, the link should load as an overlay that rises from the bottom of the screen. The Sneak peek overlay, when allowed to rise to its maximum height only covers about 90 percent of the screen, but it does allow users to view and scroll through the entirety of the content within the link that is being previewed. Once users are done with their peek, the overlay can disappear with a swift downward swipe or by tapping the gray X in the top-right corner of the overlay. There does not seem to be a way to convert the overlay into a tab of its own at this time. Users may need to open a new tab as they normally would, once they exit the overlay. Editors' Recommendations Skip to content Do you find yourself with a lot of tabs open but dread closing all but one manually? Now you can close all of your tabs with a single click, and have just one ready to go with the Close all Tabs extension. Before We all find ourselves with a lot of tabs open sooner or later. That is not so bad until we realize that we need to close all of them and get back to work. A person could open a new tab and manually close the rest or close the entire window and restart Chrome. But a single click solution would be a lot more convenient. After There it is...the single click solution. Just click the Toolbar Button and BOOM! One fresh window with a single new tab page showing. Now if you could only take the rest of the day off... Conclusion The Close all Tabs extension may not be something that everyone would use, but if you are tired of manually closing all of those tabs then you will definitely like it.
